the elderly. Despite it being one of the most dangerous and complicated of operations, work continued to take place. No where was the need to stay safe more important than on the rooftops of the tallest buildings. On September 5, 1903, a 30-year-old policeman saved the life of a man who had fallen six stories to his death. It was a dramatic rescue. As he was going up in the elevator, the man lost his balance and, falling backwards, struck the wall of the elevator with his head, knocking himself out. The man was stuck on the building's rooftop. It was a winter's day and the cold made the job more difficult. Eventually a few policemen ascended in the elevator. It was easy to tell the man was unconscious because he was not moving. One policeman climbed onto the man's back and lifted him onto the rooftop. He then revived him with a powerful breath of fresh air. By the time the medical team arrived, the man was breathing normally and was okay. The head of the medical team told the police that they could not give the man a lift back to the hospital because the rescue man, who had saved his life, was afraid he was going to lose his job. The policeman who assisted at the rescue said that he had never seen such bravery. When the man was told about the policeman's bravery he said, "I feel like I am going to have chickenpox and I do not want to let them treat me for fear that they will lose their jobs." The policemen were then given medals for bravery. The man stayed in hospital for a long time but eventually recovered. Around this time, the General Superintendent of Police, who was the highest-ranking officer in London, began touring the city. He went everywhere; the hospital, the police station, the docks and the hospitals. He met the firefighters and the ambulance drivers who helped to save his life. The only thing that he had wanted to see was the rooftop but his modesty, and that of the rest of the officers, prevented them from going. On the day of the visit they went to work as usual but asked leave to go home early. The Superintendent was informed that they were leaving early and asked to follow them. When the Superintendent arrived on the roof, the firefighters and the ambulance drivers were still there. They had just finished a particularly dramatic rescue. A boy had fallen through the open fire escape and had fallen onto the roof. He was lying on the

The Geography Blog focusing on all things geography: human, physical, technical, space, news, and geopolitics. Also known as Geographic Travels with Catholicgauze! Written by a former National Geographic employee who also proudly served in Iraq and Afghanistan. Friday, December 27, 2011 Last winter I posted this blog entry and since I have been working on it with my friend, it seems more complete now. In the last year I read three books that have made a major impact on my thinking. I have also had my own experience of a similar effect. Through a set of coincidental circumstances and circumstances that I had not anticipated, I found myself at the very moment where I was most passionate about a project that seemed to be coming to its natural conclusion. The first book was John Steinbeck's The Log from the Sea of Cortez. Steinbeck's book explores the relationship between man and nature in a small town in Central America, Tres Marias, California, and the connections between the people and the land that to some extent make up their individual characters. The second book was Henri Cartier-Bresson's book, Life, Images and Form, published in 1955 and first translated to English in 1994. It is a collection of essays in photography (many of them taken by Henri Cartier-Bresson) that not only explores the process of picture-taking but also many of the other things that photography does for us. In particular, it proposes that a photograph is a record of a moment in time and that its essential element is time. The third book was Peter Freuchen's Arctic Adventure published in 1955. After reading Steinbeck's The Log from the Sea of Cortez, Freuchen was the last of the great portraitists of the first half of the twentieth century. Peter Freuchen's book explores the Arctic environment, the Inuit and Inupiat people, and the Chukotka region, as well as the relationship between man and nature. I was particularly struck with the concept of "the time of the eye," a phrase that the author repeated throughout the book. As I worked on these books and discussed them with others, the conversation I had about that phrase and the concept it represented was the most powerful and important moment in any of the three books for me. As I was thinking about it, I got to thinking about what the moment would be like if this most powerful principle of Steinbeck, Cartier-Bresson, and Fre
