Q: What's the difference between 'validate_uniqueness_of' and 'validate_format_of' for Ecto.Changeset? I'm having some issues with Ecto.Changeset regarding uniqueness validation. I found that there are validations that come built-in to Ecto.Changeset, such as validate_uniqueness_of, validate_format_of, etc. What is the difference between these validations, and which one should I be using in which context? A: The validate_format_of performs an implicit coerce to either an integer or a float, if the regex isn't valid. If a float, then the number is rounded to 0, otherwise it's just round down. This has the nice side effect that it doesn't catch if the string is valid but the end result is absurd (2.0) and if the string is valid but the end result is absurd (0.0000002). I've found this helpful for checking correctness of strings that are used for numerical columns, as always there's the risk that something that should be 0.001 will end up as 1 due to rounding. The types you'd want to validate should be doubles. In terms of the more commonly seen validate_uniqueness_of, this is like validate_format_of but instead it throws a ValidationError if the constraint evaluates to false, rather than just returning nil. As a rule of thumb, you might be tempted to use validate_format_of when checking for integer constraints, as validating that a value is floating point is more likely to be type-related than checking for uniqueness. I have a PostgreSQL database with a DECIMAL(5, 2) column that I use for real-world numbers that I'd like to be in the range of 2-5, and I've had problems with the rounding. The validation throws a hard exception instead of just returning nil, so I can catch the exception and handle what I want to when it happens. Q: Updating multiple records in Oracle using sp_executesql for Stored Procedure I have the following basic sp that I want to execute and I want to update multiple rows. The problem is it always shows the following error ORA-24247: 24247: execution of Stored Procedure failed 24247. 00000 - "24247
