Effects of ultrasonic emulsification and different stabilizers on the physical properties of soy protein isolate emulsions. Ultrasonic treatment was used to generate aqueous emulsions of soy protein isolate (SPI) by controlling the ratios of its three components, soy protein isolate (SPI, 81.2%), soy oil (13.4%) and glycerol (5.4%). The effects of four factors, surfactant type (Tween 20, Span 20 or Tween 20/Span 20 mixture), SPI concentration (0.3-2%), ultrasonic power (0-50%), and emulsification time (5-45 min) on the emulsion characteristics were studied. The emulsion creaming stability was determined as a function of surface tension. The emulsion drop size was measured with a dynamic light scattering (DLS) system. The zeta potential was determined with a Zetasizer. All the physical properties followed nonlinear trends with increasing ultrasonic power and time, and decreasing SPI concentration or oil content. High correlation was seen between ultrasonic power and the physical properties of the emulsion. The Span 20/SPI ratio of the emulsion was also shown to affect the physical properties in comparison to those of the Tween 20/SPI ratio. The physical stability of the emulsion was increased by changing the ratio of the three components. These properties could be controlled by ultrasonic treatment. interest. Search form Survey of the Nexus This research examines how the nature of the nexus between the United States and Northeast Asia has changed over time and across different actors in the alliance. In the immediate aftermath of the Korean War, many scholars saw the Korean peninsula as a test-bed for an emerging U.S. strategy of counterbalancing and containing the Soviet Union. Since the end of the Cold War, however, what has changed? To what extent has the nature of the alliance changed? To what degree is the underlying political economy of Northeast Asia driving the current state of affairs? What are the future implications of alliance politics for U.S. strategy and regional politics? The survey explores how the nexus between the U.S. and Northeast Asia has changed in three important dimensions. The first dimension examined is in the nature of the alliance itself. The survey tracks the changing nature of the alliance, as it has shifted its focus from North Korea, as a showcase of hubris, to North Korea, as the master-axis of Russia's border. The second dimension considers the question of "where" the alliance is directed: While its core has been directed at Pyongyang in the past, and at Moscow in the Cold War, it is now directed toward Beijing in the current Northeast Asian political ecology. The third dimension considers the nature of the "who" of the alliance: the question of who between the U.S. and its Northeast Asian allies is in charge. In the post-Cold War period, the U.S. has tended to seek to establish its political interests rather than to seek to achieve a balance of power. This research is supported in part by the Social Science Research Institute, University of North Carolina, and the Council on Foreign Relations, a nonpartisan foreign policy and international affairs organization.
