Cloud computing, referring to sharing of computing resources over a network, is a model of service delivery for enabling convenient, on-demand network access to a shared pool of configurable computing resources, such as networks, servers, storage, applications and services, that can be rapidly provisioned and released with minimal management effort or service provider interaction. Service providers may use a cloud computing environment, such as the public cloud, to provide access to various services, such as Infrastructure as a Service (IaaS), Platform as a Service (PaaS), Software as a Service (SaaS) and/or Applications as a Service (AaaS). Service consumers can access cloud-based resources through various network-based connections including, for example, without limitation, broadband connections, cellular connections, the Internet, and the like. Cloud computing services are typically consumable services, such as storage, memory, and processing power. In addition, cloud computing services may be provided by one or more service providers. Challenges faced by cloud computing systems include cost control and management. Cost control can be difficult to achieve in a cloud computing environment in which services are shared among multiple service consumers. Managing cloud computing resources involves provisioning and deploying servers, network connectivity, software, operating systems, storage, and other primary compute resources needed to support consumer demands. In addition, as cloud computing services are provided, management schemes are implemented to balance service level agreement (SLA) commitments and overall load. However, the allocation of cloud computing resources is still inefficient.
