Hum Dil De Chuke Sanam is an."The biggest mistake people make is they don't realize there is a wrong way to do it and a right way to do it." – Ryan Holiday It's strange how most of the advice you see around the internet is just a repeat of how some author told you to do something. Really, what the internet has lead to is a bunch of extremely opinionated self-help people telling you what to do. The problem is, none of them know what they're talking about. To get around this, I've compiled a list of 20 internet phenomena that actually work (sometimes). 1. Self-help books When I started out, I didn't really care for self-help books. However, over time I've collected quite a few. I currently have over a dozen in my stacks. Some of these books are better than others. The thing that unites all of them is that they're all of different people trying to help you with different things. The reason these books are so good is that they're not just gurus telling you how to do stuff. Every page has a story where the author is either a success or a failure at what they're sharing. 2. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a layered image processing device, and more particularly to an image processing device having an image processing layer provided on a transparent substrate. 2. Description of the Related Art A layered image processing device having a transparent substrate having an image processing layer provided on the substrate is known. Such a layered image processing device is described in Japanese Patent Laid-Open No. 8-108614. In this device, light-shielding is performed on the back side of the transparent substrate to prevent light leakage in the lateral direction. The device is used in a liquid crystal display device for a mobile phone, and a liquid crystal display device for a personal computer or a liquid crystal television. If an inorganic material is used for the image processing layer, the device may have problems such as light leak in the lateral direction, color fogging, uneven light transmission, and peeling of the layer. Therefore, an organic material is generally used for the image processing layer. In particular, a metal oxide such as indium tin oxide (ITO), is used for the light-shielding portion of the image processing layer. The use of ITO has an advantage over other materials in that a highly light-transmissive white color can be achieved and that the light-shielding portion of the image processing layer is more clearly visualized. As described above, the transparent substrate having the image processing layer is used for a liquid crystal display device for a personal computer or a liquid crystal television. In the future, there is a possibility of using the device as a display for a mobile phone. In the mobile phone, the device may be used in a wide variety of configurations. For example, the device may be used in a large screen such as a liquid crystal television. When the device is used as a large screen, the light-shielding portion of the image processing layer may
