Enhanced potency of recombinant alpha-thrombin in pulmonary thromboembolism due to heparin bridging in C57/BL6 mice. Reduced protection against pulmonary thromboembolism in mice challenged with thrombin has now been convincingly attributed to platelet-mediated immunosuppression caused by heparin bridging at low doses. We therefore evaluated the pulmonary effect of recombinant thrombin as another more efficacious anti-thrombotic agent in a mouse model of clotting pulmonary thromboembolism. Subcutaneous injection of increasing amounts (25, 50, 100, 250 or 500 microg/kg) of purified human alpha-thrombin or its active site inhibited the aggregation of mouse platelets induced by collagen. Serotonin release was dose-dependently stimulated by human thrombin of equal efficacy. Mixing thrombin with heparin (5 IU/ml) markedly enhanced the pulmonary effect of 500 microg/kg thrombin in C57/BL6 mice challenged with platelet-rich clots. The activities of recombinant thrombin were not reduced by heparin. Mixing with heparin did not affect the activity of heparin alone (12 IU/ml, 225 U/kg) in the assay. Platelet depletion (22.5 mM ZnSO<sub>4</sub>-induced) or inhibition of endogenous thrombin generation (100 mg/kg hirudin) abolished the heparin-dependent potentiation of the antithrombotic effect of thrombin (500 microg/kg). In hirudin-prevention experiments, mixing with heparin (5 IU/ml) did not increase the efficacy of a high dose of thrombin. Thus reduced anti-thrombotic efficacy of thrombin in heparin-bridged pulmonary thromboembolism is determined by two factors-heparin-induced platelet activation and quantitative effects of heparin. Heparin alone, however, can stimulate platelet activation, and heparin or
