The present invention relates to an electrical arrangement for a direct-current circuit breaker, comprising a movable contact element and a stationary contact element for making a connection between the current path and a load, and comprising a short-circuit device comprising at least one movable contact arm which extends around the movable contact element and which is movable between a release position, in which the movable contact element is electrically disconnected from the stationary contact element, and a closing position in which the movable contact element is in contact with the stationary contact element, a short-circuit device from the closing position to the release position, and for the purpose of subsequently repositioning the short-circuit device is a movable rheostat. In the known electrical arrangement, the movable rheostat may be moved from a release position to a closing position by means of a lever. When the lever is actuated, the movable rheostat is moved into a position in which the movable contact element is in electrical contact with the stationary contact element. The short-circuit device is subsequently repositioned by means of a further lever, which also serves for moving the movable contact element away from the stationary contact element is moved into its closing position), as well as the second set (i.e. the step in which the movable rheostat is moved into its closing position), as well as the second set (i.e. the step in which the movable rheostat is moved into its closing position), as well as the second set (i.e. the step in which the movable contact element), has to be performed manually, for which reason the operation of the electrical arrangement cannot be automated. It is an object of the present invention to provide an electrical arrangement for a direct-current circuit breaker, comprising a movable contact element and a stationary contact element for making a connection between the

Synthesis of large scale, high quality ZnO nanorod is a significant step toward the development of ZnO photocatalytic materials with high efficiency. In this paper, we describe a new method to prepare large scale, high quality ZnO nanorod arrays using simultaneous injection of metal ions and photon energy (UV-Vis). In our method, the rod-shaped ZnO with a wurtzite structure was synthesized on a glass substrate by a hydrothermal method in the presence of acetate as a precursor in a solution with a large temperature gradient. The continuous growth of ZnO nanorods onto the substrate was observed. The length of the nanorods was controlled by the reaction time, and the diameter of the nanorods depended on the initial concentration of acetate, the size of the stainless steel pipe used, and the reaction temperature. We also demonstrated that ZnO nanorods formed a random array on the substrate and that this type of array is suitable for use as a d0c515b9f4
