Q: What are these semi-long arcs similar to a release line in the Pacific and Atlantic oceans? What is the name of these huge semi-long arcs in the Pacific and Atlantic ocean? I think they are made from warm water and salt. They are visible from space, google earth showing them: below as an example A: They are called Pacific and Atlantic subtropical gyres. As a result of atmospheric dynamics, the waters near the surface of the ocean that are too warm to contain salt are pushed upwards and carried away. This convective current causes the air to rise. The air rises well into the stratosphere where it cools and sinks back down creating a circulation in the upper atmosphere called the Hadley cell. Pacific and Atlantic subtropical gyres are significant circular oceanic currents, driven by wind, that occur in a subtropical region between the tropics and polar regions. These systems form and transform due to winds and ocean currents.
