Photoshop: A Time Machine or Future Vision? In the aftermath of the 2007 economic crash, it became clear that the future of Photoshop was unclear. For years, Adobe had continued to invest heavily in the development of Photoshop's features. Many users found some Photoshop features to be too clunky or cumbersome. Adobe responded by dropping its major ongoing price increases that had long been used to bill customers. Part of the reason Photoshop has become so expensive has been its many upgrades, which have consistently improved the program's performance and abilities. As the market for high-end production tools took a hit, the answer appeared to be Lightroom. Lightroom was first introduced in 2004 for Macintosh computers, and its user interface and features enabled photographers to edit, organize, and share their images without the time and frustration spent in Photoshop. In the United States, the firing of a hedge fund manager (Lloyd Blankfein) who reportedly told a Goldman Sachs lawyer (Davide Cassano) that he would destroy the firm if it did not accept a fair bid for his client's holdings, has put Wall Street in a new light. The way the Goldman lawyer handled the situation demonstrates a conflict of interest. For Goldman Sachs to destroy Blankfein's firm, it had to have his approval, since Blankfein owns a controlling interest in the firm. In China, economic reform has been greeted with widespread complaints by many consumers, businesses, and local governments about rising food prices. The Chinese government responded by claiming that food prices were not expected to increase any further. One government website has said that food prices will continue to drop, and major supermarkets have announced that they will begin importing fruits and vegetables from overseas to offset increased supply at home. The Chinese government also said that they would allow China to import more frozen meat and poultry. Recently, the G7 countries, of which China is a member, announced they will begin to discuss restrictions on food imports from China, due to the large increase in imports. Both China and the United States are currently dealing with unfair competition. China's unfair competition is manifested by increased imports, while the United States' unfair competition is manifested by labor and environmental violations at home and in China, not to mention the company's management. If China's food prices rise further, China

Q: Prevent certain functions to be access in REST API backend I have the following function in express middleware to prevent the user from accessing a certain endpoint: router.post('/ping', (request, response, next) => { if (typeof request.headers.origin!=='undefined') { response.headers.origin = `${request.headers.origin}`; } if (request.headers.userAgent.includes('FancyWeb')) { response.status(403).send('403 Forbidden'); return; } next(); }); And it works, but it's not good to implement this function for all API endpoints. But this seems to be the only viable solution as far as I know. Is this the right approach? Is there a better option? A: You can try check rules in node side. It's also possible to write custom routes and handle them. This approach has some pitfalls but in your case it seems the best choice: const forbidHttpRequest = (req, res, next) => { if (typeof req.headers.origin!=='undefined') { res.status(403).send('403 Forbidden'); return; } next(); }; router.post('/ping', (request, response, next) => { forbidHttpRequest(request, response, next); next(); }); router.get('/ping', (request, response, next) => { return response.status(200).send("You ping"); }); router.post('/test', (request, response, next) => { return response.status(200).send("You test"); }); router.get('/test2', (request, response, next) => { response.status(200).send("You test 2"); }); Q:
