Direct oral anticoagulants (DOACs): an overview on management and monitoring. Direct oral anticoagulants (DOACs), available for the prevention and treatment of thromboembolic disease, are now widely used for the treatment of venous and arterial thromboembolic events. Unlike warfarin, which requires strict monitoring and dose adjustments, DOACs are administered at fixed daily doses. Their pharmacokinetic properties are similar to those of the vitamin K antagonists. Among these, the most studied are the factor Xa inhibitors, such as rivaroxaban, apixaban, and edoxaban, and the direct thrombin inhibitor, dabigatran. Despite their efficacy, the evidence supporting their optimal use, including specific indications, doses, and duration, is still insufficient. In addition, no guidelines specifically address these drugs. Nevertheless, patients with bleeding risk factors and/or elevated bleeding risk scores need special care, and those with renal failure, cardiovascular disease, or other potentially serious comorbidities require special monitoring. Specific DOAC doses and monitoring recommendations are outlined in this review.

os University Oikos University (or Oikos College) was a Seventh-day Adventist liberal arts college located on the campus of the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary, Andrews University, and the extension campus in the Portland, Oregon suburb of Beaverton, Oregon. Oikos University was the first independent college of Adventist higher education in the Western Hemisphere. Oikos is the Greek word for "home." It was first established in a small building above the Portland Convention Center in 1974, and was approved by the Seventh-day Adventist Church as an independent seminary college for the health sciences in 1983. Background Oikos served as a seminary college for four years beginning with the academic year 1983-1984, at which time Andrews University's existing Doctor of Ministry program was discontinued, and the college began an inaugural cohort of graduates. In 1986, Oikos' second cohort graduated and began work. In the following year, the college began accepting students for its Bachelor of General Studies program. Students could complete any major or minor or interdisciplinary studies. In 1992, Oikos' fourth cohort began, and in 1993 its third and final cohort graduated. Following the retirement of its founding president, Malcolm Brown, the university was reorganized into a student-run corporation. School President Gavin Leet, helped to form Oikos, Inc. as a non-profit corporation. By the next year the corporation had more than fifty instructors and over 300 students. Among the new members were instructors who had formerly served in academia's instructional leadership roles, previously experienced by college staff. This included Allan G. Fleming who was hired as the co-founder and CEO by Gavin Leet. In April 2014, the college campus was demolished. Campus The campus was located on the north side of the University of Portland campus and north side of the TriMet light rail line. Courses were offered simultaneously online and at on-site locations at the campus. History On November 5, 1974, the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists created a committee to develop plans for support of an independent postgraduate school of health sciences. Projected to serve a three-year period, the school was modeled on the University of Florida's Palmer College of Chiropractic. The committee received the name "Wimock College" in honor of Bruce Wimock, a Washington State University professor. On October 10, 1976, a meeting was
