I haven't taken it out of the box yet, but I am considering picking up the 16GB memory model instead of 8GB. The dual-core CPU is certainly capable of running all the applications I have installed on the Mac, but with only 4GB of DDR3, I'll be tempted to upgrade that to 16GB or perhaps 32GB at some point down the road. The only thing that worried me was the 160GB HDD in the laptop's enclosure. I had anticipated much higher capacity than this, but I'm considering expanding it later. If that's how it's going to be, I might go ahead and buy a faster SATA drive now. I have now booted into the Mac, and it's really quite nice to work on. The screen is a bit small, but it looks great when watching movies or using the Mac to browse the internet. I had been wondering if there was an option to create a "stripped down" version of OS X that could be downloaded onto the HP Envy X2 to make things easy and to save space. It turns out that this is not an option, but instead, I can simply run Lion on the Mac and download the Lion recovery part to perform a clean install onto the HP.Will Black Holes Help Solve Our Solar System’s Attractiveness Puzzle? A region of high-density dark matter in the middle of the Milky Way could be solving the “too cold, too dim, too chaotic” problem. If we had to prioritize issues related to the formation and evolution of our own Milky Way galaxy, would black holes be our top choice? (OK, I guess we already do.) In 2014, scientists modeled what the Milky Way galaxy looked like if a collection of black holes formed at its

Is it legal to write software code that programs a computer or device using a method where you program it to run your own algorithms on a powerful machine with a lot of memory - then use the results to program a less powerful but cheaper computer or device. If so, what legal implications does this have? The idea behind the idea is to allow small business and start-ups to make their own modifications and customisations to existing technologies, then sell them on. A: Disclaimer: IANAL. I would think that it's most likely legal under US copyright law, which allows authors to sell their work as long as you don't make a practice of it. In practice, this may mean that you can't make a profit from your software, and that your users have to buy it from you. However, you will have no problems if your users can directly use your software. In this case, since the code is your own, it's not really a copy of any copyright-protected work, so the user can pretty much do what they want with it.
