Geographers use topography to describe the features or irregularities of Earth's surface: An example would be the slope of a mountain range. So, most likely, a topographic map would chart the elevations and contours of land and its borders. I searched for the term "topographic map" on Google and a similar image came up: This obviously shows that the term "topographic map" itself contains a hidden message. DISCLAIMER: This theory is still only a theory.

Image source A: A topograph is a map of the land, generally of a city, state, or country. From the US Army Geographic Center: If geographic information is taken at high resolution, i.e., of 1:25,000 and greater, it is referred to as a topographic map. Topographic maps are usually downloaded from the United States Geological Survey website as a tif image of the vector data (a raster image of elevation data). The elevation data has been stored in contour lines to indicate the topographic map grid. The contour lines can have names that describe characteristics of the landscape (e.g., "rocky area," "valley," "wash," etc.) or a numerical value that is assigned to each contour line (i.e., the map is numbered). The names and number values are used by the Army Corps of Engineers when issuing
