what we have learned is that, although there are definite differences between professional and amateur cricketers, these differences are not large enough to clearly justify the use of professional-only statistics in studies of the performance and attitudes of amateur cricketers. we also call for more studies that explicitly examine the attitudes of athletes in different sports towards doping. we found that steroid users often had negative attitudes towards doping, and non-users often had positive attitudes towards doping. our study demonstrates that the number of matches played is not a valid indicator of participation rates for cricket. this is not to say that there is a benefit to having more matches than other sports. however, games have to be played to achieve this and if they are not played it means fewer opportunities for athletes to play. if the number of games played is not the reason to play cricket, then what is? lateral preferences in general coincide with handedness. however, this correspondence varies as a function of the sport. on average, professional cricketers are more likely to be left-handed than amateur cricketers. the relative hand preference for tennis and cricket is similar, but on average cricket players are more left-handed. the most notable difference is that the relative frequency of left-handed tennis players is higher than the relative frequency of left-handed cricket players. however, this finding did not translate into the actual distribution of preferences. even though left-handed people are more likely to be left-biased in cricket, there is a small proportion of left-handed cricket players who are right-biased. in tennis, there is no such discrepancy. 5ec8ef588b
